New York-based designer Nicole Fuller has made a name for herself creating homes that are both bold and refined. For a native New York couple, who previously commissioned Fuller to do their homes in Boston and Italy, she transformed their one-bedroom SoHo residence into the ultimate gilt pied-à-terre. From the living room and powder room, to the bedroom and closet-turned-office, the designer paid meticulous attention to detail—and it shows.

In the living room, the walls are covered in high-gloss lacquered panels, the vintage sofa is upholstered in a Loro Piana cashmere, the dining chairs are from Kasmin Gallery, and the dining table is a custom design by Fuller.

In the living room, Fuller covered the largest wall in high-gloss lacquered panels to accentuate the height of the ceiling, an idea that took some time to convince her clients was the right move. “It’s difficult to show someone a 12-by-12 sample and say, “This is going to be a wall,”” Fuller says. Thankfully, her powers of persuasion are well honed. In the same room lives one of Fuller's most notable pieces: A sculptural sofa she had reupholstered in a luscious Loro Piana cashmere—juxtaposing the lacquer with warmth and texture.

In the master bedroom, sconces from Pucci hang above custom nightstands from Promemoria. The bed is from Frou and the bed linens are from Olatz.

Fuller carried the lacquered paneling into the master bedroom, where blue high-gloss panels follow the curves of the ceiling; custom nightstands by Promemoria flank the bed; and geometric sconces from Pucci echo the room’s architectural details. Surprisingly, the office off the master bedroom was a former closet. Now, outfitted with a desk, chair from Maison Gerard, and wallpaper in a custom color, it's a cozy office space. "My client texts me all the time from his closet office and tells me how much he loves it," she says.

And that is precisely Fuller's goal: to create a space that is not only designed with the client in mind, but one that exceeds their expectations. As they say, it's all in the details.
